So in the Edda, the Giant Skrymmer only notices the dreadful blows of Thors hammer as the falling of a leaf, or some other trifling matter. In the English story of Jack the Giant-killer, Jack under similar circumstances says, that a rat had given him three or four slaps with his tail. In the story of The King of the Golden Mountain, it will be seen how the giants are outwitted and deprived of the great Northern treasures, the tarn-kap, the shoes, and the sword, which are equally renowned in the records of the Niebelungen-lied and Niflunga Saga, and in our own Jack the Giant-killer. The other Thumb tales are full of such adventures. They are all exceedingly curious, and deserve to be brought together in one view as forming a singular group. At present we can only refer to the pages of MM. Grimm, and particularly to the observations in their notes. The Grateful Beasts, p. 68.--Die treuen Thiere; from the Schwalmgegend, in Hesse. It is singular that nearly the same story is to be found in the Relations of Ssidi Kw, a collection of tales current among the Calmuck Tartars. A benevolent Bramin there receives the grateful assistance of a mouse, a bear, and a monkey, whom he has severally rescued from the hands of their tormentors; Quarterly Review, No. Xii. p. 99. There is a very similar story, Lo Scarafone, lo Sorece, e lo Grillo, in the Pentamerone, iii. 5. Another in the same work, iv. 1, La Preta de lo Gallo, embraces the incidents of the latter part of our tale. The Oesta Romanorum also contains a fable somewhat similar in plot, though widely different in details. The cunning device of the mouse reminds MM. Grimm of...
